When I'm seeking organizations to volunteer with, the first thing I look at is their mission. What is the purpose of them raising funds? Who are those funds going towards? And for me, the organizations that always stand out are the ones that are involved in agriculture and involved with the youth. To not serve them and to not support them, I think is a disservice for our future.

Building relationships in the community is so important. During the local tornado disaster, I was at the command center, and I walked out of the door one noon. I was like, Dang, I smell hamburgers. And there was Texas Farm Credit said, we're here to serve you, and it was a wonderful hamburger. Let me tell you what, can you help somebody else?

It makes you feel better as a person, and it makes you feel like you've done something for your community. Companies really want their employees to give back to the community because it shows that they're not only vested in the financial contribution in the community, but also they want to give back to the people that are investing in them as well.

The Texas Farm Credit Scholarship has benefited me at Texas AMM by allowing me to focus on the classroom work and my studies and relieve some of the stress of worrying about how I'm going to finance my education and allowing me rather to focus on my education. Being a fourth generation South Texas cotton farmer, I'm very appreciative of businesses like Texas Bond Credit who give scholarships to encourage students to further their education. As the agricultural industry is facing the challenge of feeding the world's growing population.

Texas Farm Credit provided King Ranch Institute for Ranch Management with a significant gift over a ten year period of time, which allowed us to greatly expand our mission. We think it's a great partnership. We know that we share some similarities in our mission in that both Texas Farm Credit and the Keen Ranch Institute for Ranch Management is dedicated to the future of those that are involved in agriculture. We want them to be successful, and by partnering, we're able to provide opportunities that can increase the chance of success for the stakeholders in our industry.
